- Separation of kolaviron into its three main fractions
- Extraction of Curcumin (a phenolic diarylheptanoid) from Curcuma longa L.

- Studies on the anti-oxidative, anti-diabetic and hypolipidemic effects of kolaviron and its fractions in vitro and in vivo.
- Studies on the radioprotective effects of indigenous herbs with chemotherapeutic potentials in Wistar albino rats
- Screening of selected medicinal plants as putative inhibitors of soluble epoxide hydrolase (sEH): in vitro study.
- Possible anti-proliferative effects of selected medicinal plants against prostate carcinogenesis in PC-3 and LNCaP cells: in vitro study.

(b) In progress □ High throughput screening of herbs of Nigerian-origin as soluble epoxide hydrolase and 20-hydroxyeicosatetraenoic acid synthesis inhibitors: A novel therapeutic target in hypertension

The adverse effects of some antihypertensive drugs, such as Ca^{2+} channel inhibitors, alpha and beta blockers, etc are well documented. The need to protect humans against hypertension and related cardiovascular diseases (CVD) using newer and safer class of antihypertensive drugs is important. Therefore, a search of natural products that can protect humans from CVD is a key issue in cardiovascular research. The use of plant products may be beneficial in protecting against CVD since they are less toxic than the synthetic compounds. Recently, soluble epoxide hydrolase (sEH) inhibitors are gaining attention as potent antihypertensive agent. This enzyme converts epoxyeicosatrienoic acids (EETs), a metabolite from arachidonic acid to dihydroxyeicosatrienoic acids. This reaction results in a loss of biological activities of EETs, in particular its ability to mediate in vasodilation as endothelium-derived hyperpolarizing factors. Therefore, agents that can inhibit sEH synthesis will elicit antihypertensive effect. The current studies are centered on the protective efficacy of crude extracts from some medicinal plants such as Garcinia kola, Alchornea laxiflora, Alstonia boonei, Morinda lucida, Curcuma longa L, Xylopia aethiopica, Mallotus oppositifolius, etc, as putative inhibitors of sEH. The extracts will be tested in vitro by high throughput screening using three different models; U937 cell line incubated with or without the extracts, biochemical assay kits from Cayman chemical company and HPLC screening. Based on the screening, functional studies involving calcium imaging with fluo-4-AM dye will be conducted to ascertain the effect of extracts on calcium signals in transfected HEK 293 cells capable of expressing TRPV1 585i ion channel, and whole-cell patch clamp experiments will also be conducted.
